The relationship between socio-economic factors and Chlamydia trachomatis infection in South East London: an analysis of patient characteristics and access to care. The objective was to assess the relationship between socio-economic factors and Chlamydia trachomatis (CT) infection among men and women in a defined population, and to examine whether these relationships are influenced by the availability of local C. trachomatis testing and treatment facilities. Three cross-sectional surveys were undertaken among 552 men and 706 women from a defined population in East London. Response rates of 70% and 71% were achieved for men and women, respectively. The prevalence of CT was higher among those with less than year 11 education and in those living in areas of deprivation. No association was found between CT infection and the type of accommodation (apartment or council house) or marital status. Women from ethnic minority groups (non-British White), aged 25-29 years and 35-39 years and students had a higher prevalence of CT than other women. The prevalence of CT infection was lower among women who had attended sexual health services in the past three months, even when adjusted for age, and among those who had never attended. A significant interaction was found between living in an area with access to Chlamydia testing, and being younger than 25 years, or being married. There was no evidence of an association between CT infection and access to local testing services. This study has demonstrated a significant association between socio-economic factors and CT infection among men and women in this population. Public health interventions aimed at preventing CT infection, and reducing the social inequalities in CT infection among those infected, need to be taken into account.
